Subject: Sociology

Q1: Write a note on the origins of Sociology discipline. (250-300 words) (5)

Sociology emerged in the early 19th century in response to the challenges of modernity. The advances in technology led to the exposure of people to different societies and cultures. Some people did not like this change because it broke their old traditions. So, thinkers started trying to understand why societies stick together and how to fix problems caused by these changes.

The term sociology was founded by French philosopher Auguste Comte in 1838, also known as the “Father of Sociology.” He thought if we understood society better, we could make it better. He called this idea "positivism", saying that social lives could be understood through observing the law of sciences. He envisioned sociology as a means to uncover the laws governing social life, with the ultimate goal of guiding societal progress and development.

Moreover, in the 19th and 20th centuries social upheavals, including political revolutions, industrialization, and urbanization took place. These things led early sociologists in understanding social change, inequality, and the establishment of social order.

As sociology gained recognition as an academic discipline, universities in Europe and the United States began offering courses and establishing departments dedicated to its study. The growth of sociology was marked by the formation of professional associations like the American Sociological Association (ASA) and the International Sociological Association (ISA), which facilitated collaboration and research across different areas of interest. Today, sociology is a big field with lots of different topics, and sociologists study things like families, laws, emotions, and many more aspects of society.

Q2: Explain the importance of understanding the Global Perspective in Sociology. (250-300 words) (5)

Understanding the global perspective in sociology is really important because it helps us see how societies around the world shape people's lives. Where you live affects how you live, from the jobs you have to the opportunities you get. Each and every decision we take is affected by social forces.

As the world becomes more connected through things like the internet and travel, it's crucial to understand how different countries and cultures interact with each other. This helps us see that many of the problems we face, like poverty or environmental issues, are connected globally. For example, in Pakistan, issues like poverty and access to education may be similar to those in other countries, but the specific challenges and solutions could be different. So, by learning about other societies, we can learn more about ourselves and how to make things better in our own country.

By looking at how different countries deal with these problems, we can learn new ways to tackle them in our own society. It also helps us see our own society in a new light, understanding our own strengths and weaknesses better. For example, if we know how other countries handle certain issues, we can learn from them and maybe improve things in our own country, like Pakistan. So, being aware of what's happening globally can help us understand how society shapes our lives, even in our own corner of the world.

In simple terms, thinking globally in sociology helps us understand how societies work together and how we can make things better for everyone, no matter where they live. It's like learning from other people's experiences to make our own lives and communities better.
